Overview

This panel explores the developments of South American historiographies regarding the 20th century social and cultural histories of local societies. It aims to discuss in which ways the major frameworks of our field of knowledge have set the tones and boundaries of History writing by local scholars, and, on the other hand, how local perspectives on national or regional South American histories have helped to enrich broader environments of historiographical debates.

The panel comprises five papers related to specific historiographical approaches. In all of them, the reflection on the contours of modernity and modernization in South American contemporary society has a central role.

Barbara Weinstein's paper focuses on the domain of labor history, shedding light on how, in the past decades, other categories of workers, beyond the classic conception of an industrial working class, have been envisaged as part of shaping of a modern society in Brazil.

Gabriela Pellegrino's sheds light on the circulation of social forms of mobilization in the Amazon, overcrossing the national borders. It approaches the social demands coming from various social groups for the creation of different kinds of "reservations".

Olivier Compagnon's paper presents a balance of the uses of the social history of ideas by South American scholars in the field of religion, particularly regarding the intellectual debates that shaped, in transnational bases, the theology of liberation.

Camila Gatica Mizala's addresses the debates on transnational cultural circulation related to the cinema and the ideas of modernity of Chilean and Argentinean urban societies. To close the panel, Juan David Murillo Sandoval discusses how the history of books and the history of media – of both, radio and television – have renewed perspectives on contemporary cultural practices among urban and rural population in Colombia.

Panelists work with the premise that the developments of the historiography represent not only a contribution as "case studies" resulting from international historical frameworks, but that they have been offering decisive elements to reframe the field of History as a whole.
